My grandfather's old box

Last weekend I helped my parents tidy the attic. While we were sorting old boxes, I found a small wooden box that had belonged to my grandfather. He died when I was seven, so I did not remember him very well. The box was dusty and the lock was broken.

Inside there were old photographs, a school medal, a few letters in blue ink, and a small notebook. The photographs were in black and white. In one of them my grandfather was about twenty, standing in front of a small house with two friends. They were all wearing simple summer clothes and smiling. The notebook was full of short notes about his work as a teacher: which lesson worked well, which student needed help, what he wanted to try next.

At first I felt strange as if I was reading something private. But my mother said it was good that I had found the box. She told me that my grandfather had always wanted his grandchildren to know about him. After dinner we sat at the kitchen table and looked at the photographs together. My mother explained each one. I learned more about my grandfather in two hours than in all my previous twelve years.
